INTRODUCTION

According to most experts, with agriculture, fisheries, hydropower and tourism directly affected (roughly about a quarter of the economy) the strongest effect of climate change on Croatia would be on one of the country's most important asset: its natural resources. So, while climate change matters are not perceived as an immediate concern by the broader public, environmental questions, and the struggles they may cause, remain a useful way to raise awareness and start mobilising. The recently recurring floods, one disastrous concrete sample of these impacts, allowed for a first awakening. And currently three issues have become focal points in the national debate: the planned extension and development of coal-based power plants in Istria, the growing resistance to a wave of energy-poverty related home evictions, and increasingly the mobilisation against oil-drilling in the Adriatic. All these environmental and social struggles fuelled by the resolute lack of consultation, present a strong connection to climate change and offer an opportunity to mobilise from Zagreb to Paris. The message that we want to convey is both positive and empowering. As explained in the Group's climate strategy, priority should be given to the energy narrative of the fight against climate change. We would use this opportunity to promote the fact that it has its own project for Europe- a Green energy union – to convince Croatian citizens about the necessity and added value of having a strong EU. And in the Croatian context, it means starting from the concrete mobilisations for tailoring our message on climate change and raise awareness. Running counter the traditional governmental narrative of jobs and growth in reward for environmentally damaging decision, it's all about how the energy transition can foster new activities and boost employment.
