EU truck size rules/monster trucks

MEPs put the brakes on gigaliner proposals

The European Parliament's transport committee today voted on proposals from the European Commission on EU rules truck dimensions (Directive 96/53/EC). MEPs voted to postpone a decision on the proposals from the Commission, which would have legalised the cross-border use of excessively long 'gigaliner' trucks, until the Commission carries out a thorough impact assessment on the possible consequences (1). Commenting after the vote, Green transport spokesperson Michael Cramer stated:

"MEPs have today voted to put the brakes on this backdoor proposal from the Commission to give the go-ahead to gigaliners. Today's vote, if confirmed, would prevent this legislative review from being used to legalise the cross-border use of gigaliners. However, it only buys a little time for ensuring a more responsible approach to this revision of EU rules on trucks. According to today's vote, the European Commission is tasked to deliver the missing impact assessment of cross-border trips from these controversial monster trucks before retabling any such proposal (1)."

"Importantly, the postponement was supported by MEPs of all political colours. We cannot push blindly ahead with such a complete change of European law, without assessing the potentially dramatic consequences. This assessment must take account of the impact allowing cross-border transport of these gigaliners would have on the environment, road safety and public finances. In particular, this implies assessing the potential impact of a change in the rules on the shift of freight away from rail, which is clearly safer, more efficient and better for the environment. Studies highlight the risk that more than 35% of single-wagon load could be shifted from rail to road (and up to 13% of combined transport). Only a few companies would profit from this, with potentially major costs for society."

"The Greens will now use this time to advocate a different approach to these rules at all levels. There is no public support for these monster trucks and the Commission cannot simply tailor EU legislation to the interests of an extremely narrow lobby at the expense of the public."

(1) The European Parliament is expected to vote on these proposals as a whole at its April plenary session (14-17 April). The transport committees' vote would postpone any decision to revise EU rules to allow the cross-border transport of these gigaliners, excluding it from this current legislative review.
